THE SOURCE OF MUSCULAR POWER,

A Recent Lecture Delivered in Boston by Dr. J. H. Kellogg of the Battle Creek Sanitarium. .

Dr. Kellogg, who for many years studied Dr. Kellogg, who for many years studied and is recognized as an authority on Physical development, explained the source of muscular power as follows: The muscles are machines. Every muscle is a live engine, which, using the bone as a lever, does work. The popular idea that beefsteak is the best muscle-food is a great error. The muscles like other engines, are fed by carbon, the burning and oxidation of which is the source of muscular power. Starch and fat are to the muscles what wood, coal or coal oil is to the locomotive. In the body starch and fat are converted into glycogen, or animal starch, which is stored in the muscles, ready for use when needed. Every muscular movement is accompanied by what might be termed an explosion of glycogen, analagous to the explosion of agun or cannon from sudden combustion of gunpowder. Starch is the great muscle food, because the mest easily converted into animal starch or glycogen. This explains the fact that "bread is the staff of life." Cereals are the chef reliance for the subsistence of laboring meu, as well as laboring animals, but the starch must be cooked by being thoroughly brown. Mushes produce despepsia and weak muscles, and should be scratched off the bill of fare. They are wholly discarded by the new cookery and replaced by dextrinized cereals."

The inside gamblers know that Lou Houseman was managing Jack Root, and local sports were afraid to bank too heavily on the Chicago man. They thought their money might be taken, and, while assured that everything was fixed for Root to be declared the winner, Gardner might win. That Gardner tried to lose on a fool was evident to everybody near the ring. He began to deal suspicious blows as early as the zecond round, and Root's seconds began crying "Foul" to the referee.

In the sixth the fouls were so patent and persistent that the joils were evident to all.

P. T. Fowers, president of the National Association of Professional Baseball Clubs, had a few remarks to make regarding the attempt of Dale Gear, secretary of the Players' Association, to enlist the players against the reserve rule.

"When the Players' Association was formed," said Mr. Powers, "its members forced what is equivalent to a two years' contract upon the minor leagues. The moment an opportunity came for them to jump they went to other leagues right and left, regardless of their second-year agreement with us. We appealed to the Players' Association in this emergency, but no attention was paid to us.

"There are sixteen organizations in our association. Now that we mean to protect our interests, we begin to hear an outery from the players. Mr. Gear's letter is not worthy of consideration so far as it relates to contract obligations between players and leagues. About 1,500 men will be employed by our leagues this summer. Let Mr. Gear get out and find employment for them if he doesn't like the way we are going to apply penalties to those players who desert us. The fact of the matter is we cannot do otherwise than we have arranged, and the players have only themselves to blame for antagonizing the clubs that give them opportunity to develop."

William Sharsig, business manager of the Philladelphia American League Baseball Club, died at his home here to-day, aged 4 years. The greater portion of Mr. Sharsig's life was devoted to baseball, and in 180, when the Athletic club of the American Association won the championship, he was manager of that team.
